

Subject Company: US Airways Group, Inc.
Commission File No. 001-8444

Greetings from Charlotte!

I'm writing this en route back to Dallas from Charlotte, where I spent Valentine's Day visiting with both our people, and our soon-to-be colleagues at US Airways' largest hub, speaking with many of the team there.

I was quite heartened by my experience. US Airways' Charlotte Vice-President, Terri Pope, was great fun to be with, and she is clearly a servant-oriented leader. Terri and her team are proud of their hub's many accomplishments; the one I thought most praiseworthy was that they've gone over a year without an aircraft damage! A record like that can't be set without great teamwork and attention to safety.

The people I spoke with were uniformly thrilled about the potential of becoming part of the new American. Many of them have been through multiple mergers and bankruptcies in the past, and we talked about things that went well and things that didn't. Clearly there is a wealth of experience out there in the US Airways team that we can use to make sure our merger is accomplished better than anyone else's.

The most common question was about our travel policy, which isn't surprising, given that we're airline employees, after all! I know that is very much a top question for our people as well.

We all visited the new website, www.newamericanarriving.com, which has a great deal of information about the merged airline, and I urge everyone to have a visit.

I return from Charlotte even more confident about the great future ahead for the new American. We expect to soon be working with many smart and experienced people who are enthusiastic about making our new airline the best it can possibly be.

My experience on announcement day was clearly quite a bit different than most everyone else's. I'd be interested in hearing your impressions, wherever you were in our system.

For the time being, though, we must keep running our own airline to our high standards, and keep our customers in mind as much as we can. After all, our competitors would love to steal them from us! We have to keep focused on our business today, while we work toward a brighter future.

Take care,
Don
