DFW Passengers Can Practice Saving a Life While Passing Time

Everybody knows that cardio-pulmonary resuscitation can save lives. Now, visitors at DFW Terminal C can learn how to do it while they’re waiting around. The American Heart Association and American Airlines Occupational Health Services have worked together to put a “hands-only CPR kiosk” near that terminal’s Gate 7, “allowing hands-on practice with an actual CPR manikin and automated watch-while-practice CPR program,” the AHA said. The kiosk walks a learner through the steps of administering CPR through chest compressions, no mouth-to-mouth required. For more information, go to heart.org/handsonlycpr.

U.S. Pilots to Need More Flight Time to Qualify

In a long-awaited move, the United States will increase the flight experience required of pilots on U.S. airlines. The new rules take effect once they are published in the Federal Register. First Officers will now need Airline Transport Pilot certificates to take control of U.S. commercial airliners or cargo planes. The certificates are earned with 1,500 hours of total flight time. Previously, a co-pilot needed only a commercial certificate, requiring 250 hours. Captains would still need at least 1,500 hours of flight time but now 1,000 hours would have to be logged as a co-pilot on a commercial carrier. Previously, those hours could be earned in flight school or military training. The FAA has drawn criticism from the National Transportation Safety Board for taking years to develop the rules.
